Note: During his long and prolific career, A. Y. Jackson travelled more widely than any other member of the Group of Seven. Over almost seven decades he painted every corner of the country, even the most remote, documenting the Canadian landscape. In essence, Jackson was a plein air painter and was compelled to continually travel and sketch, often in areas close to home, and often in the company of friends and fellow artists. Later in his career, Jackson frequently painted in the Upper Ottawa and Madawaska Valleys, a region that was comprised of both rugged terrain and rural farming country (depicted in this work). Jackson continued to paint until 1968, when incapacitated by a stroke. He spent his final years as an artist-in-residence at the McMichael Gallery (now the McMichael Canadian Art Collection Art Gallery) in Kleinburg, where he is buried.
